STEM students polish leadership skills

A group of Solano Community College students participated in the 13th Annual Mathematics, Engineering, Science Achievement (MESA) Student Leadership Conference Oct. 14-15 at the Santa Clara Marriott. The conference, themed “The New Face of STEM,” was invitation-only for student leaders in science, technology, engineering and math.

Students engaged in a number of creative activities designed to sharpen their professional skills. They competed in an elevator pitch challenge styled after the hit show “The Voice.” Audience members voted by live polling during this PG&E-hosted competition. SoCalGas led a team-building Lego Challenge, and a networking social event included improv games geared toward enhancing social and emotional skills.

Students also participated in mock interviews, connected with industry representatives, heard guest speakers and attended workshops. This focused on so-called “soft skills” as a key to shaping well-rounded STEM professionals.

The event was fully sponsored by industry donations. Pacific Gas and Electric, Southern California Gas Company, Edison International and San Diego Gas & Electric were the top sponsors, with additional funding from CHC Consulting, Intel, Applied Materials and Jabil. Other partners included NASA, Tesla and AT&T. The Solano conference attendees were sponsored by PG&E.
